The first of these is the fact that the world is not a uniform whole, but a collection of many different parts, each with its own characteristics and interests. This is the case with the human world, where different nations and peoples have different customs, languages, and ways of life. It is also the case with the natural world, where different regions have different climates, plants, and animals. This diversity is a source of richness and interest, but it also creates challenges for those who seek to understand and govern the world as a whole.

The second of these is the fact that the world is not a static whole, but a constantly changing one. The human world is in a state of constant flux, with new nations rising and old ones falling, with new ideas and technologies being developed, and with the power of different nations waxing and waning. The natural world is also in a state of constant change, with the climate shifting, with new species appearing and old ones disappearing, and with the earth's surface being constantly reshaped by geological forces. This change is a source of dynamism and progress, but it also creates uncertainty and risk for those who live in the world.

The third of these is the fact that the world is not a simple whole, but a complex one. The human world is a complex web of relationships, with many different interests and powers vying for influence. The natural world is also a complex system, with many different factors interacting in ways that are often difficult to understand. This complexity is a source of fascination and wonder, but it also makes it difficult to predict and control the world's future.

These three facts—the diversity of the world, the constant change of the world, and the complexity of the world—create a sense of mystery and wonder that has inspired human thought and action for centuries. They also create a sense of responsibility and duty that has led to the development of laws, ethics, and governance. It is our task as human beings to understand the world as it is, to embrace its diversity and change, and to work together to create a better future for all.
